I prefer to keep the manual editing in Photoshop, but that's just me. Lightroom does a better job of showing metadata than Photoshop did with the old method of maintaining metadata in separate Photoshop (layer) files. Alea iacta est! The program can now import RAW image files from multiple camera formats (thanks Sony!). I was pleased to see this include the unusual but useful Nikon NEF format. Though the program accepts the raw data in NEF, it does not appear to automatically generate a native TIFF file as it does with the traditional DNG format. Visually, the imported NEF appears to be a perfectly acceptable JPEG. Also, there are additional correction controls if the image was first saved in the JPEG format. While RAW and NEF files have been available to Lightroom users for some time, Lightroom 5 adds the ability to create multi-page PDF files that include pages and images. Lightroom 5 also supports PDF rendering of static images, something Canon has not done with its EOS Viewer application.

While Photoshop will continue to be available on Mac and Windows, the macOS version will be delivered in a new air-inheritance package. This shift is designed to give us an opportunity to remove many of the cross-platform headaches and under-the-hood differences inherent in a legacy packaging model. Today, I am excited to share with you the first version of what I’m calling Photoshop Share for Review (beta). With the advent of the new API, we can develop a version of Photoshop that is 100% natively GPU accelerated, achieve an unprecedented level of performance for users and even enable a version of the Photoshop application optimized specifically for the web. With this higher performance, it will be possible to use Photoshop’s cutting-edge editing capabilities and tools using a web browser and export the image back to Photoshop for further processing.
